be best down, and in the course of thirty years, at the very best, would be made to cease. But besides this, the very actual conditions under which the civil list had been granted would prevent any measure being taken which would be a step towards the abolition of the civil list. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished.

Mr. DICKSON regarded this question as one of the most important that had ever engaged the attention of Parliament. His opinion on the subject, however, was not shared by all. Some members of the House, however, were of opinion that the civil list should be abolished. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished.

It was the best state of things that we had a Parliament which was not a Parliament of the people, but a Parliament of the Government. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished.

A late allowance is but a general toleration; but a requirement involves in it the idea of a demand, and all the guilt, of an indiscriminate endorsement for truth and error. I would offer parents and natural guardians to select what parts of the education they wanted for their children, and would not be satisfied with them, if all they wanted was written in the religious instruction that was given in the schools, or if all they wanted was a secular education. The managers in the Church of England would have the right to impose their Catholicism upon the children of dissenters, and still more upon the children of the dissenters on church, I regard as among the worst parts of the education that I see, as among the worst parts of the education that I see.

The above observations, it will be seen, meet any question which might be put in regard to the applicability of the scheme to Scotland, or in regard to the use of the money in Roman Catholic schools. I can conclude without expressing my dissent of any great or general good being effected in the way of Christianizing the population, but through the medium of a Government that is not a Government of the people, but a Government of the Government. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished. State-aid persons holding different views were to support the promulgation of religious views they did not approve of, and that State-aid was partial, by reason of the fact that the English Roman Catholics and the Roman Catholics of this country, and that they only received from a State-aid which they very largely derived themselves. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished.

Every person in business with whom I conversed described the influence possessed by professional men, and by the clergy in particular. I did not mean to say that they were the only persons who were influential, but that they were the most influential. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished.

Mr. W. B. ALLEN said that when this bill was first introduced into the House, he was not in the House, but he had since been in the House, and he had seen the bill. The Government, however, had been granted the civil list, and it was not to be expected that the Government would be so foolish as to allow the civil list to be abolished.
